Wednesday, September 15, saw the opening of the duck shooting season in Missouri, both under State and Federal laws. Owing to the high stage of water during the greater part of the year, duck shooting should be better this season than ever before; the fact that ducks in large numbers have nestled in Missouri this year alone should account for greater numbers of waterfowl. The wet season also will aid in keeping them in local waters until late in the season as feed is growing wild in abundance along the streams and ponds. Indications also point to a more plentiful supply of wild turkey this season than ever before and squirrels, reported as scarce in many localities earlier in the year, are now to be found in large numbers where hickory nuts grow. An extra large crop of hickory and other nuts will also tend to keep squirrel in such localities longer than would have been the case had nut crops been light. The wet season during hatching season will cause quail to be scarce in many localities, unless they migrate from other parts.

Already several cases of typhoid fever have appeared in Farmington, and local physicians say more will likely follow because of the unsanitary conditions of many cesspools and out-closets, made more dangerous to public health by the recent heavy rains. The News has repeatedly this summer called attention to the need of an examination of the city's condition from a sanitary standpoint, to be followed by such cleaning-up as might be found necessary by such an investigation. So far as a united effort along this line, nothing, we believe, has been done all summer. To say that such work has been un-necessary is to speak ignorantly of the facts. The stench from certain quarters of the town not half a dozen Opening.

A couple of months ago when the REGISTER published the statement that there were 50,000 bushels of our city just as free from dangers of contagious diseases as possible. The vast majority of our citizens do take such precautions, but there are always a few who do not know the bad effects of these unsanitary places, or do not care. If offending property owners and occupants will not clean up, there is ample recourse in law to compel them to do so.—Farmington News.
